To the Momory of Leucks N. Burdick, Oh! not alone they weep you dead
Who soothed the nating brow of pain;
Unnumbered flowers above your bed
Shall bloom from out the summer rain.

Oh f not slows the straining eye gives token of the loss we feel; From day to day the heart's sad sigh Fours forth what it cannot concess.

We would be comforted—but ch!

How shall we quelt the fleeding tea

For sweet humanities that blest

Within the circle of your years! O blessed days that cheered the heart— The sweet commune of wit and song— We thought not then that we could part. But it has come—for oh, how long !

How long, shat I for me the strife,
As the fair seasons come and 60,
Ere I behold thee in that life...
A faith for me...that thou doet know

Be still, my heart! and weeping eye Leek not upon the mountal pai s... Oh! look beyond the changing sky Where the Great Father gathers all! WILLIAM R P.

ar and kissing her brow, he said : Marie, here are the morning papers filled with accounts of the last great battle, and a package directed to you from Montery, Mexico. I did not know you had friends in the wars."

Nor I, she answered, as she took parers and packages with trembling hands. "You shall see it, however, whatever it may be."

the room. Repairing to her own apartment, this beautiful weman locked the door, and laying the package upon the table sat down, pale and agitated, gazing upon it. After a moment's struggle she tore the covering from the packet, and a gold locket fell in ber lap. She uttered a stiffied shrick as she saw it, and two words escaped her lips !

"My husband!" What caused her eyes to dilate so wildly, her face to blanch so deadly white, her bosom to heave with such convulsive throbs, and her whole frame to quake as with a great fear?

Slowly taking up the locket, she touched a spring with her trembling fingers, and revealed -upon one side the miniature, a large, handsome man; upon the other was a counterpart of herself. Between the two was a small piece of paper. This she took up in a mechanical, almost vacant way, and read these lines :

"L-R-died the first man on the ramparts of Monterey, with the enemy's standard in his bands. His last word was—'Marie!'" His friend W. A., taps at the lady's door, to which no answer was made. It was repeated louder and louder for some minutes, with the same result. At last it was forced open, and there in her chair, as we have described her, sat the beautiful woman, her eyes fixed upon the fatal paper and locket, but her form rigid in CHAPTER XI. LEGIA IS CAPTIVITY.

We must now return to Leols, whom we fear we have already left too long for our reader's reared to waken her, and declined it. pleasure. And surely it is a pleasure to us, as well, for-strange as it may seem to some-the author feels as much interest in his own heroines as in reading of those drawn by other pens.

Leola's insensibility did not last long. Indeed they had proceeded but a few hundred vards in the woods, ere she recovered her full consciousness the Guerilla chief would call on the Senora, durof her true situation.

She felt herself held upon a horse by the hand of a strong man-whom she did not know, for she circaded to open her eyes. She knew, however, that she was in Castillias' power, to suffer whatever be might design for her. At this moment, however, her ears caught the distant sound of horses clattering on the hard road which they had just left. She opened her eyes, and beheld Mariana, mounted behind another horseman, riding by her side. The faithful serwant placed her finger to her lips in token of si-ience, and pointed backward to the high road. Then came the sound of fire-arms, and the two captives knew that succor had come; but in what force, or what would be the result, they could not guess. They could only hope, and that nerved

They soon, however, lost the sound of strife, as the horsemen, emerging from the level plain of timber, struck into a pass or gorge, which gradnally became deeper, more broken, and craggy, and so rough as to render it difficult of travel, On either side rose the beetling rocks, broken and jagged, surmounted with what appeared a small fringe of stunted pine and Mosquito bushes, giving the dreariest aspect that could be imagined to the scene.

This gorge wound round through broken hills. and cloud capped heights, in such a labyrinthian manner, that Leola could not tell, after an hour's ride, whether they had travelled twenty miles distant, or whether she was but a mile from the spot of her capture. On every side, was the same beetling crags and rough, brown rocks, surmounted by its fringe of parched shrubbery. Of one fact she had become convinced, and nersed her heart for the worst. She knew that even should her friends conquer the desperate band of her captor, they would never be able to follow her through that winding path.

It was a bitter thought to give up this hope, but she had seen so much peril and sorrow in the last few days, that she was ready to brave any thing now. Indeed her spirit was so broken that she met it with a listless fortitude, feeling that it was in vain to strive against her fate. As it drew towards noon, she began to gree weary and pained, by the uncomfortable position in which she was forced to ride. She looked up In the face of her guard, to see if she might ven-Lure to question him, but his rough, stern features

Taking a bridle path round the mountain, they at last came in night, just at high noon, of a ranche, built long and low, and surrounded by a picket, after the manner of the country. The travelers approached this, and a low, burly man, with a bull head and neck, came forward to open the gate.

"Ha! Julio, what pretty birds have you got there?" he exclaimed, as he saw the captives.

"True, true; and it will be more comfortable,

The party were soon mounted, and again again took the country, and traveled west, to ward the mountains.

It was not quite sunset as they approached the mountains, and entering through a long narrow defile or pass, they emerged into a small vale looking as if it had been scooped out of the heart of the hills. On the right, stood a large, oldtimed castle, surrounded by small huts or cabins, like a hamlet, with women sitting in the doors, or moving about them, white children were seen playing in the green valley. The castle itself, looked old and tottering, and had evidently been sound reached her ears from without.

Mariana flew to the window that looked down into the court, and in an instant came back.

"It is the chief, Castillias, and his band, coming home," she said, sadly. "Have they any prisoners?" cried she.

their way-whither, Leola could not tell. But she had traveled considerably with her father, and from the face which the country now bore, after passing through the long range of mountains, she judged they were to the west of Coldareta, and traveling in the direction of Encarnation. This supposition soon proved correct, as, about the middle of the afternoon, they came upon a road which she knew led to Lanares, and which they followed for a few miles to the right, when they built centuries before. "The Robber's House !" thought Leola. "And "At your pleasure," said the man as she left
